Meccan Trade And The Rise

Meccan Trade And The Rise Of Islam is a 1987 book written by scholar and historiographer of early Islam Patricia Crone. The book argues that Islam did not originate in Mecca, located in western Saudi Arabia, but in northern Arabia. Her views are hugely different from those of historians and orientalist scholars like W. Montgomery Watt and Fred Donner, who have publications detailing trade activities and the struggles between competing Meccan tribes for control over trade routes.

If we take it that trade is the crucial factor behind the appearance of a prophet in Arabia, the spread of his message there, and the Arab conquest of the Middle East, then the answer is evidently yes. But, in fact, Meccan trade cannot be said ever to have provided a convincing explanation for any of these events. The view that Meccan trade is the ultimate cause of the rise of Islam is Watt's.

In her book Meccan Trade And the Rise of Islam, Patricia Crone challenges the prevalent western view, supported mainly by Henri Lammens and Montgomery Watt, of pre-Islamic Mecca being a rich, sophisticated trading center dealing in many high luxury products with great markets and rich merchants, with caravans going to and coming from all corners of the Arabian Peninsula and the rise of Islam ...

Meccan Trade and the Rise of Islam is an incredibly detailed study of what pre-Islamic trade 'might' have been like. Crone explains that there are too many uncertainties and far too little written or archaeological data to draw any definite conclusions, but what we do know is that the traditional narrative about a prosperous trading city in the middle of the desert simply do not add up.
